FALL-OUT

The Lucky Quarter

They call him the millionaire soldier. On July 24th in the afternoon, he was broke. Before midnight, he had won a cool million dollars. From that day on, he never gambled again; but invested all his money in U.S. Bonds. He had been given a weekend pass. From the depths of despair to the high point of riches — all within the period of 24 hours. He tells the story:

"I was broke and hungry. My father had been a gambler, and you can understand why I did what I did. I saw a well dressed, middle aged man; and I went up to him. I asked him if he could spare just one quarter. With it, I would get a sandwich. But as you all know, with it I made a million dollars. So I went over to the sandwich machine. The cheapest sandwich and very thin looking was only a quarter. I was about to deposit the coin when I noticed the sandwich door was partly opened. Somebody must have put in the coin and then hurried away. So I got the sandwich free. And I had the quarter. I put it into a one arm bandit machine. Out came a hatful of coins.

From that moment on, Lady Luck was with me. I broke one bank after another. And I stopped only when I had won my million dollars. Then I took a vow never to gamble again, not even for one cent. I wish I could find the man who helped me make that money. I would reward him."

Suddenly that well dressed, middle aged man arose and shouted,

"I am the man who gave you the quarter. Where is my reward?"

"You are not the man I want to reward," was the answer. "I want to find the man who left the sandwich in the machine for me."

The Cure?

Sergeant Manners was an old, retired, army man. He lived by himself and spent most of the time playing checkers, dreaming of his fighting days, and alas, also drinking. He went to the veteran's hospital for his annual checkup. Young Dr. Kinlley liked the old soldier. So he had him go through a battery of tests.

"Come back on Monday," he told the sergeant, "and I'll give you the results."

"If we had to fight a war that way, we would have been defeated long ago. What's the matter? Can't you tell me right now if I am o k.? Or have you found something wrong with me?"

"Maybe you are fighting a war," was the unexpected reply. "I have you down in my appointment [illegible] Monday [illegible] that he could figure out, all he was doing at times was daydreaming about his fighting days. That was his only fighting. He kept the appointment to the minute and was in the doctor's office.

"If there is really something seriously wrong with me, doc, go ahead and spill it," he said.

"It's your liver," was the reply. "You drink like a fish. You have to give it up. From now on, when you want to drink during the day, take an apple and eat it."

"Impossible to do. The cure would kill me," was the startling answer.

"Why?" demanded Dr. Kinlley. "Apples are good for you."

"But I can't eat thirty apples a day," sighed the army man.

The Lunch

All we can tell you is that this little story is said to have taken place some time during the last century in a country that had just finished a war with another country. The army was built on the caste system. Only sons of nobles and the landed gentry could be officers. The soldiers were drafted from the peasant population. The captain was making his rounds. He noticed that the sentry at the mountain outpost was missing. So he looked around and found the soldier eating some berries.

"You have left your assigned post in war time," said the captain. "This can be punishable by death before a firing squad."

"The war ended three weeks ago," replied the soldier. "I was hungry. You sent me here without any food. So I ate some berries."

"For that you shall be punished," shouted the captain as he took his pistol out from the holster. "See the grass on the ground. Eat it until I tell you to stop. Otherwise, I shall kill you."

The soldier sighed. Orders were orders — sometimes. So he bent down on his knees and ate a lot of grass. Then he arose slowly and knocked the pistol out of the hands of the captain.

"Now you eat grass also until I tell you to stop," he ordered.

So what could the captain do? He too bent down on his knees and ate a lot of grass. Then he arose. Perhaps a wiser man — and then again, perhaps not.

"I am willing to consider this matter closed, but on one condition only," said the captain. "You are to swear that you will never tell the other soldiers or my officer that we had lunch together."
